TENDERNESS:

For the past two years, Dr. John Openshaw has been tenderness testing our yearling sale bulls by using AI (artificial intelligence) technology. This technology is 25 years more advanced than any other ultrasound technology available. From a consumer's perspective, there are five palatability factors concerning meat; Tenderness, juiciness, flavor, aroma, and color. Current ultrasound-based technologies used for carcass evaluation has a direct correlation to the measurement of the amount of back fat, rib-eye area and intramuscular fat known as marbling; but there has been a need for a more accurate analysis pertaining to the tenderness portion of the quality grade.

Tenderness is important and can be measured with cutting edge patent pending ultrasound techniques. Tough muscle has a coarser structure having larger sized muscle bundles. Meat comprising a smaller muscle bundle will be more tender. Animals are born with a set number of bundles within their own muscle makeup. They never grow any new bundles nor do they lose any. This patent pending technology allows us to see both the IMF and the bundles with very identifiable clarity. IMF also does not show up in the muscle but between the sheaths of the muscle bundles that make up the muscle. Another aspect of tender is that you cannot feed tender since the animal is born with the certain size of muscle bundles.
